Dear Dr. Chuck,

I hope you are doing well.

I wanted to share an important update regarding the Persian translation of Python for Everybody. I have now completed the full translation of the book, and only the final editing and polishing steps remain. I am attaching the full PDF draft so you can see the progress and completeness of the work.

I also wanted to mention something briefly and respectfully:

While reviewing the list of translated books on your website, I noticed that the Persian version was attributed to someone else. Since you had previously given me your kind permission and encouragement to work on this translation—and I have devoted substantial time, effort, and care to completing it—I was a bit surprised and concerned.

Of course, I understand that coordinating many global contributions can be complex, and I am sure this was simply an oversight. I just wanted to make sure my work is properly recognized and that my completed translation can be considered for the official listing once finalized.

I would also like to clarify that this translation is intended to be freely available for everyone, in line with the spirit of accessibility and openness you have always promoted. It is important to me that Persian-speaking learners can access the book without barriers, and your support has made this possible.

Your trust and encouragement throughout this project have meant a great deal to me. I deeply appreciate your generosity in allowing translations to be published freely and even enabling translators to retain royalties for printed copies. It is a truly admirable model that empowers global learners and educators.

Thank you again for your kindness, vision, and support.

I will continue polishing the final version and will send both Word and PDF formats when the edited edition is ready. If you have any preferences or instructions, I would be happy to follow them.

Warm regards,

Nooshin Zekavat
